Continued study of recent KEYHOLE photography has disclosed identical earth-mounded structures at the Heng-Yang Uranium Ore Concentration Plant (26-47N 112-38E) and the Pao-Tou Atomic Energy Complex (40-39N 109-57E).

The exact function of the structures has not been determined, although they may possibly be sumps for the collection of waste liquids. The structures are within the security confines of both areas, suggesting a possible association with radioactive materials. The configurations of the earth-mounded structures are identical, and each appears to contain two possible semiburied pumphouses. A control building is superimposed on the earth mounding. The single earth-mounded structure in the northwest corner of the Heng-Yang Plant was under construction in [REDACTED] and in the final stages of construction in [REDACTED]. The two structures at the Pao-Tou complex are situated directly north of the waste basins. Excavation for the westernmost structure was first apparent in [REDACTED] and the middle stage of construction was reached by [REDACTED]. Construction of the easternmost structure lagged behind that of the first, but both structures appeared complete in [REDACTED] (TOP SECRET RUFF)
